

MAIL STRIKE MIX-UP:

VISA STUDENT DEPORTED

LETHBRIDGE (CUP)—A foreign student at Lethbridge Community College has been ordered to leave the country over an incident that arose from the recent postal strike and his misinterpretation of immigration legislation.

Victor Hon-Sing Suen, a first-year electronics student, was convicted because his visa had expired two weeks before he applied for an extension. He has been ordered to leave the country by November 27.

Suen first entered Canada in the fall of 1977 when he was granted a student visa that was valid until September, 1978. After finishing high school in Vancouver, he was admitted to Lethbridge Community College this September.

When he arrived in Lethbridge, he reported to the local Immigration authorities. They gave him a temporary visa valid until October 15, because his records were in the mail.

The officers told him he would be notified when his file arrived and if he did not receive a notice, he should report back on October 15.

Suen misinterpreted the complicated procedure. Because of the postal strike he did not receive his notice until October 30. When he did receive notice, he went to the Immigration office, expecting to have his visa renewed.

Instead, an inquiry was held, which ruled that Suen had been illegally attending Lethbridge College from October 16 on.

The Legal Aid Society of Alberta refused to give Suen any aid since they felt it was not a case usually covered by legal aid.

The only alternative for Suen is to return to Hong Kong and reapply for a visa. This is a lengthy process and he may not receive the second visa.

The second trimester of Suen's course starts November 22. Suen said he is going to try to finish his course work but is very upset. This will have a strong impact on how well he does, he said.

At present, a member of the Central Committee of the National Union of Students and a fieldworker of the Federation of Alberta Students are investigating appropriate avenues to assist Suen in Lethbridge.

Euro-buck gains:

US dollar loses ground

by Rick Boychuk

"In Europe the decline in value of the American dollar has led to a movement for a European currency," said Professor Robert Mundell yesterday.

Mundell, however, doubts whether it will be successful. "Before a genuine currency can develop there must be a power center in Europe. Brussels is emerging as one but it is not yet important enough," he said.

The Columbia University economist, speaking at a lecture sponsored by the Economics Students' Association (ESA), considers a "monetary union in Europe a good idea," if somewhat remote. Economic, political and monetary equilibrium are essential preconditions, he concluded.

Mundell's address dealt with international economic problems created by floating currencies. The movement from currencies based on the gold standard to currencies based on the US dollar has not been painless, he said.

The gold standard served a useful function. "Global discipline was maintained by convertibility into gold," and international currency surveillance was performed automatically. "The gold system performed the function of determining the monetary policy of all countries." The problem was that it set a fictitious price for individual currencies.

Exchange rates based on the dollar lack the automatic monitoring provided by rates based on the gold standard. There is no "multilateral surveillance" to coordinate world monetary policy.

Fixed exchange rates based on the dollar were not amenable to "multilateral surveillance" but they are "absolutely compulsory under flexible rates," says Mundell.

World capital flows and international trade have linked individual economies. Each country must be responsible for its own inflation rate and managing its own economy while cooperating at the international level.

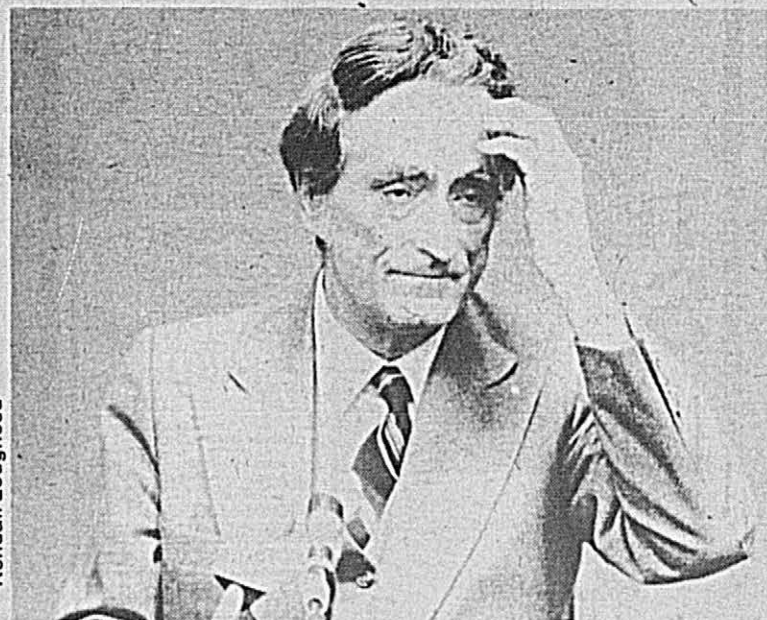

What we need now, is to determine "what policy mix we need to achieve domestic and international stability."

Meteorologists predict some snow this weekend. Take a hint from this man: dress warmly and get your snowballs out.

Reorganization a success:

Ryan says party bigger and better

Kendall Loughheed

Ryan told CEGEP students last week he considers himself a Québécois first and a Canadian second.

by Denis Gascon

Claude Ryan described himself as "Quebécois first and Canadian after," to nearly 500 students at CEGEP Brébeuf last Wednesday.

The leader of the provincial Liberal Party, Ryan said "Quebec needs special status" within Canada. Ryan said the federal government has been able to expand its power due to a "vague and unwritten constitution."

When asked how Quebec should handle its international relations, Ryan said that important aspects, such as defence and External Affairs must be handled by the federal government. However, on cultural and educational issues, Quebec should have its own foreign policy.

Ryan feels cutbacks in government spending and education are necessary now because "taxpayers have too much to pay."

The former editor of Le Devoir told his audience he believes the structure of his party has improved since April 1978. A new party executive has been elected, their fund-raising campaign is expected to reach $1.25 million by December, and the organization has become a "mass party" with nearly 100,000 members.

The party has also been decentralized, according to its leader. The upcoming political program will "not be built exclusively by the party elite". Ryan is looking for greater participation and "voter input".

Ryan stressed the new diversity of the party. "Immigrants, French and English-speaking people from all social strata have made the Quebec Liberal Party a "party of all Quebecers."

Ryan defined his party as "the party of freedom and individual liberties" and is lobbying for a Bill of Rights to be written into the constitution.

Sports Bio

Barry Ross

by Danny Young

The McGill Redmen hockey program was revitalized last season as talent, desire, and attitude among the players were considerably improved. This new wave in the McGill camp is probably best exemplified by star right winger Barry Ross.

Barry arrived on the McGill scene a year ago, and sparkled as a rookie until a shoulder injury sidelined him for the remainder of the season. In just eight games, the speedy forward registered 11 goals and 8 assists. Besides the scoring touch, Barry carried with him an attitude that is perfect for university hockey.

"I've always had fun playing hockey," Barry says. "You always want to win too, but the main objective is to have a good time."

Barry's junior hockey career was quite a rocky one. As a Midget AA standout with the Ville Emard Hurricanes, he was drafted by the Chicoutimi Saguenéens of the Quebec Major Junior League. In Chicoutimi, Barry and goaltender Robert Holland were the only two English players on the team. No one including the coach spoke English, so the team had an interpreter who was in polite terms, a "low-life."

"I was doing okay," Barry recalls, "but there was no communication. Over the Labour Day weekend, I broke my skates, and they wouldn't replace them. Finally, Robbie and I packed our bags and returned to Montreal. He joined the Montreal Juniors, and went to the Lachine Rapides."

After completing a year at Lachine, Barry was lured to St. Jerome on the premise that he was paid 40 dollars a week, and the team captain would pick him up at his house in Pointe St. Charles.

"I was doing pretty well until the captain didn't come and I missed a practice," Barry says. "The coach bawled me out even though I explained it was the captain's fault. During a later practice, I rammed the bastard. The coach called me over, and told me I was gone."

Barry returned to Lachine and became the team captain the following season. He accumulated 78 points in 40 games and led the Rapides to the provincial championship. That championship was won in a game against Seven Islands that Barry is not likely to forget.

"During the warmup, we were skating around, and a big guy with a black beard gave me a two-hander and told me to stay on my own side. Then he hit me and I retaliated with a two-hander. A free-for-all erupted and the refs weren't even on the ice yet. Eventually, they called in the cops. They then threatened that if anything else happened, there would be no provincial championship. We played the game and won by something like 5-2."

Barry is not sure of the exact count, but it really doesn't matter. The final score was anticlimactic.

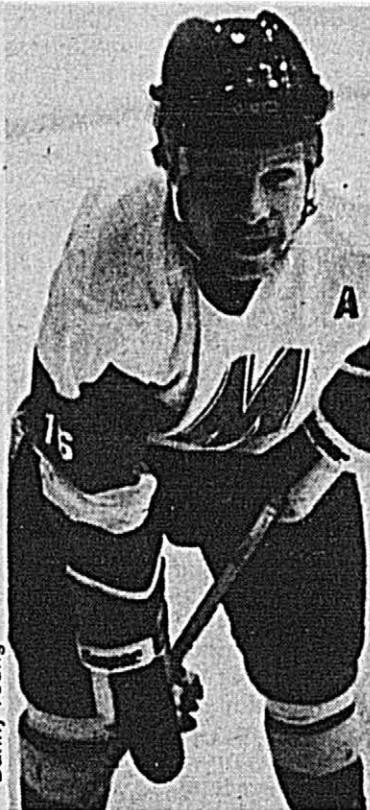

As a Redman, Barry has more respect for college hockey than the Junior ranks. "Anyone can play Junior B," says Barry. "You can make up for a lack of talent with dirty hitting. There's more skating, thinking, and ability in university."

Barry believes that the coaching at McGill is excellent because both Herb Madill and assistant Bob O'Reilly have five years of university playing experience. "The variety of drills they use show that they have a lot of experience."

Barry's centre both this year and last has been Canadiens' draftee John Swan.

"John is a real good centreman," says Barry. "We have our system worked out. If we skate, forecheck, and hit, no one can stop us."

Though the duo was off to a

lethargic start, Barry did score two goals and two assists against Laval. The end of the slump coincided with his switch from a Cooper helmet to a CCM model. Though he laughed about any idea that the helmet change affected Barry's performance, Swan is starting to notice the discomforts of his Cooper.

"I couldn't believe it," says Barry. "He asked me to pick up one for him."

Is the helmet that important? Not really. It's just all part of what Barry says. "When you play hockey, you wanna have a good time."

McGill's super combo of Centre John Swan (left) and right winger Barry Ross (right). They'll be in action tonight as the Redmen take on Laval at the Winter Stadium. Game time is 7:30.

Willis and Satch on coaches' breadline

by Brahm Pascal

"It comes with the turf." In the big business world of pro sports that can only be the sober reflection of a coach or general manager as he goes out from his often lonely position toward the baying wolves yearning for his neck. When a coach accepts a job with a pro team, he steps into a predicament, not an advancement. Subject to the capricious whims of the owner and the unique question that can have no right answer, "What have you done for me lately?" is it any wonder that the turnover of coaches last year in the major leagues ran at about 30 to 40 percent?

The situation could not have been more graphically illustrated as it was this past week in the NBA by two startling coaching changes on teams that have not been known for such moves in the past. The New York Knicks fired their former star center and coach of the team for one year and a month, Willis Reed, and astonishingly resurrected the man Reed replaced, Red Holzman, for another go as Knicks coach. Even larger reverberations on the "wow" scale were created when the once hallowed Boston Celtics revealed their growing confusion in dispatching Tom "Snatch" Sanders, coach of less than one year, in exchange for star center Dave Cowens, who will be first player-coach for the Celts since Bill Russell retired in 1969.

The Willis Reed imbroglio is yet another example of the deadly backstabbing in the front office that is characteristic of a franchise in bad straits. When Reed came to the Knicks last year, he was a man possessed with the desire to return his team to the championship glory it had known while he was a Knick. But from the start, Reed received scant assistance from his GM Eddie Donovan in attaining the team stature that both men were supposedly dedicated to.

Reed's plan was to mold his own Knick team out of the passel of draft choices that he and his scouts had handpicked. Unfortunately, the Knicks never traded for the kind of veteran players they needed to add stability and confidence to the young team. Donovan gets the finger for that slight, and the thumb for not having made one trade during Reed's tenure as coach. Instead the Knicks are still burdened with Earl "the Tarnished Pearl" Monroe and Spencer Haywood, two once-upon-a-time stars who are not on speaking terms with consistency and discipline.

Sports Comment

Eventually mercurial team president Sonny Werblin, who never supplied the vote of confidence that Reed had asked for on two occasions, decided that he may as well have a coach and GM who at least acknowledge each other's existence. Thus Red Holzman was rehired before Willis Reed was informed of his dismissal. It was the culmination of an affair worthy of the court of Cesare Borgia.

The plight of the Boston Celtics over the past two seasons has been the personal agony of their former coach and present GM, Red Auerbach. The Celtics were the class of the NBA during the '60s and early '70s, winning nine titles in ten years and thirteen overall. After Auerbach retired from coaching in 1966, the three coaches who followed him were all former members of the Celtic championship teams—Bill Russell, Tom Heinsohn and Sanders. Auerbach believes in the Celtic green and is devoted to extending the dynasty.

During the summer, however, Red's future with the Celts was up in the air as John Y. Brown assumed ownership of the team. Brown is actually the prototype of the "George Steinbrenner School of Human Relations", with an ego as vast as the Boston Garden. After some Brown-initiated trades, the Celtic 1978 line-up boasts only three players from their last championship team of '75-'76.

But after sputtering from the blocks into a second straight year of two wins in the first fourteen games, reason was supplied for the Sanders pink slip. It can only be believed that Brown has granted Auerbach one final request in allowing him the privilege of hiring the second Celtic player-coach in the 32 year history of the club.

Indications are that the Russell-Cowens analogy will not hold water as Red dreams it will. First of all, Cowens will be guiding a team comprised of faces that he has played with for only fourteen games. Hardly time enough to create the rapport necessary for a successful transition to part-time coach. Secondly, Cowens himself has admitted that most of his teammates have been sucking air since the season began.

It may take the better part of Cowens' motivational ability to get the Celts rolling. That effort might just spell a premature end to his on-court activities.
